the negroes of the country would rewith disfavor the appointment of a trie when republicans were available.

He came here and made a personal appeal to many senators. He said such appointments would be disastrous to the republicans in the South. Since then all efforts to get action by the senate finance committee on the nomination have falled, and the conclusion has been reached that the president does not now desire the confirmation of Koester.

deut does not now desire the confirmation of Reester.

This indicates a reversal of the policy announced by the president soon after assuming office and emphasized in the case of several nominations, that the best men would be appointed in the South without reference to party affiliations, and it is now said that the republican organizations in the Southern States will be conciliated with the appointment Politicians say President Reosevelt realizes that he may need the Southern delegates in 1904.
